MARTYN & HELEN ROWLEY – WHERE IT ALL BEGAN

Back in 1999, the British pig industry faced yet another blow. Farm gate prices had plummeted, covering barely half the cost of production — a devastating time for any farmer, let alone an ambitious young pig unit manager with dreams of owning and running his own outdoor-bred herd.

For Martyn and Helen Rowley, the future looked uncertain. With a young family to support and a mortgage to manage, the industry they'd built their lives around felt like it was teetering on the edge. But in that moment of doubt, something sparked.

Helen had long voiced what many were thinking: British pork, widely available at the time, lacked excitement. It was bland, forgettable — a shadow of what it could be. If the industry was going to survive, the nation needed reminding of just how good British pork could taste. The growing momentum behind local food and farmers' markets gave them hope — people were rediscovering real flavour, and provenance was becoming more important than ever.

So, in January 2000, alongside Ian and Carol Critchley of Lower Reule

Farm, Martyn and Helen took a leap of faith. They transformed an old brick farm building at Shiffords Grange into a small-scale butchery and preparation room, complete with a walk-in fridge. With no experience, no formal training, but buckets of determination, they threw themselves into the craft — learning the art of butchery, mastering recipes, and refining their processes while still running the pig unit day-to-day.

And so, Buttercross was born — built on bold flavours, traditional methods, and a passion for giving British pork the respect it deserved.

Their early days were anything but polished. With no clear-cut route to market, they began approaching farm shops and independent retailers — the kind of places that were looking to extend their range with something special. On July 8th, 2000, they produced their very first batch of Buttercross products. From that point on, they were on a mission: to prove that British pork could be anything but boring.
